In the Kingdom of England the term justiciar originally referred to any officer of the King's Court. The Chief Justiciar (later known simply as the Justiciar) was roughly equivalent to a modern Chief Justice & Prime Minister. They ruled England when Henry II was absent to Normandy, and thus, were held in great trust by The Crown.

Fully twenty, of the twenty-four Magna Carta Surety Barons are shown here, in sixty-four lines, to be tied by kinship, and/or, marriage. Many of these, or, their wives, are descendant of Robert Beaumont, Justiciar (*1) and/or Richard Lucy, Justiciar (*2). Geoffrey de Say is named three times on page one to demonstrate the multiple kinships. Were I to present all kinships of all the barons it would become tiresome.
Surety's are capitalized names. The twenty-fifth was William Hardell who was the Mayor of London and of whom we know nothing.
King John died in October 1216, before which time three of the barons died, two being killed, so the total named exceeds twenty-four.

Richard FitzGilbert de Clare, was son of Gilbert de Brionne, son of Geoffrey, Count of Eu, who was an illegitimate son of Richard I, Duke of Normandy.

WILLIAM DE BEAUCHAMP
ROGER DE MONTBEGON
WILLIAM DE MOWBRAY
WILLIAM MALET
RICHARD DE PERCY

EUSTACE DE VESCY was shot through the head with an arrow while laying siege to Barnard Castle, County Durham, 1216.

WILLIAM LANVALLY died in 1216. He was married to the niece of Robert FitzWalter,

GEOFFREY DE MANDEVILLE was the son and heir of Geoffrey Fitz Peter, earl of Essex, long-serving justiciar to both Richard and John, by his first wife Beatrice, daughter of William de Say and eventual heiress of the Mandeville earls of Essex.
Geoffrey's first marriage was to Maud, daughter of Robert Fitz Walter, Robert once sprang to the defense of his son-in-law who killed a serving man in a dispute over lodgings at court and John threatened to hang him, declaring 'By God's body, you will not hang my son-in-law, you'll see two hundred lanced knights in your land before you hang him!' When the king put the case up for trial, Fitz Walter appeared in court with two hundred knights.
Geoffrey met his death by accident in a tournament with a French knight in London in February 1216, and was buried in Holy Trinity priory, Aldgate.

My supposition:
King Henry II and his Justiciars, Robert de Beaumont & Richard de Lucy, establish English Common Law. Their grandchildren see King John as the tyrant and their stand with the Magna Carta was, "We're not going back..."
